ASSESSING EXCELLENCE— (A) SCOPE OF YOUR APPLICATION:

Awards for Teaching Excellence are given only to those with exceptional records. In assessing applications, the Awards Committee will be looking to find outstanding examples in the following areas of improvement to learning and teaching. All areas are of equal value, and your application might cover one or more of them:

- Approaches to teaching and/or learning support that influence, motivate or inspire students to learn. As well as purely instructional issues, this might cover initiatives in areas such as independent learning, student advice, equity concerns, student engagement and motivation, or assessment.
- Development of curricula, resources or services that reflect a command of the field of study to which they apply. This might include, for example, implementing research-led approaches to teaching, contributing professional expertise and creativity to curricula or resource development, or improving learning objectives and expectations in the light of knowledge of the field.
- Evaluation practices that bring about improvements in learning and teaching. Evaluation is a systematic determination of an action or activity's merit or significance, using criteria governed by a set of standards.

(It is not the same as student assessment.) This might include, for example, the tailoring of advanced or complex evaluation approaches, adaptation of evaluation methods to new contexts, or the introduction or embedding of good practices identified through evaluation.

- Innovation, leadership or scholarship that has influenced and enhanced learning and teaching or the student experience. This might include, for example, innovations or leadership in service and support, or in course management and/or coordination; research and publishing in teaching-related areas; innovative learning and teaching methods targeting atypical student cohorts, or methods influencing the social and cultural experience of higher education.

ASSESSING EXCELLENCE— (B) CRITERIA AND EVIDENCE:

Applications should make an argument for the nature and significance of the enhancement they have made to learning and teaching, providing a wide range of supporting evidence in the form of both qualitative and quantitative data. The enhancing activity will be assessed on the extent to which it can be shown to have:

- Impacted on student learning, student engagement or the overall student experience for a significant period
- Gained recognition from colleagues, the institution, and/or the broader community
- Shown creativity, imagination or innovation, irrespective of whether the approach involves traditional learning environments or technology-based developments
- Drawn on the scholarly literature on learning and teaching to inform the development of initiatives, programs and/or practice.

2. A written statement of no more than six A4 pages, in 11-point Arial or 11-point Calibri, with margins of at least 2cm, and clear separation of paragraphs. Applicants should refer to evidence which they may later be asked to produce for each of the selection criteria. The statement should include all information that might be referred to in the submission, and must be organised in this order:

ALLOCATION OF AWARD MONIES

The Award monies are awarded as a prize and disbursed to the recipient's University of Canberra account. Monies are to be used to:

- a. advance the career/s of the recipient/s;
- b. provide additional resources to support their teaching or activities related to the award;
- c. assist the individual/team to disseminate and embed good practice in learning and teaching.

SELF-ASSESSMENT CHECKLIST

Before lodging an application for an award or citation you should ensure your application is complete, and that you have provided evidence to ensure it is competitive. This checklist covers the actions you will need to take, whether you are:

- considering an application
- in the process of preparing an application, or
- about to submit an application

At the end there's an expanded section on evidence, which is important to consider at all stages of the process. The quality of your evidence will largely determine the outcome of your application.

CONSIDERING AN APPLICATION

Have you discussed your application idea with anyone else? A strong and polished application takes quite a bit of work, so discuss your idea first with someone well placed to give you a helpful critique. Your Associate Dean Education would be a good source to start with.

Initial idea discussed:

Have you in-principle support from your Executive Dean and referees?: The formal application must be signed by the Executive Dean of your Faculty, and one of the referees must also be "the Head of the applicant's faculty, discipline or administrative unit". It's a good idea to secure this support in principle before you undertake the full application. Writing a brief description of the basis of your application is also a valuable first step in presenting your activity clearly. If there are competing applications within your Faculty, your Executive Dean may have a definite view on how many, or which ones, should go forward.

In-principle support obtained:

If your application is a team one, have you spoken with the other team members? You will need the consent of all team members, and hopefully they will be willing to contribute to the application process. If the team is a large one, or the activity on which your application is based is complex, you might also discuss allocation of parts of the task with team members.

Team members consulted:

PREPARING AN APPLICATION:

Have you applied under the most suitable category? A small, but still surprisingly large, number of applicants apply under an award or citation type that is not the most appropriate for the nature of their project or activity, compromising their chances of winning. Make sure you give yourself the best chance of success.

Categories reviewed and checked:

Have you and your team members updated your CVs? This is often a more time-consuming task than it first appears, and one best not undertaken at the last minute. Get it as polished as you can, and make sure you use the length constraints of the application documentation to best effect. If the application is a group one, make sure everyone knows what is required well in advance of the submission date, and ask for drafts with time to spare before submission.

CV(s) updated, including those of team members

Have you collected the best evidence of your exemplary performance or innovative change? Is it the best evidence you can find or generate? Have a look at the expanded suggestions on collection and presentation of evidence in this document, below.

Evidence fully developed:

If your application relates to innovation, ensure you demonstrate why and how it is innovative in context. Ideas that are new to some disciplines or faculties may already be well established in other areas, and vice versa. Without explanation of your academic context, your efforts, achievements, and innovative approach may not be appropriately assessed.

Context provided:

BEFORE SUBMITTING YOUR APPLICATION:

Be aware of language that is in common use within your own discipline, but which may strike others (who may be assessing your application!) as “jargon.”

“Jargon” checked:

Check spelling. Ensure people’s names, and titles, and the names of business units, discipline areas, faculties, courses and units mentioned are correct, correctly spelled, and current (for the time in which you are using them as evidence).

Spelling/names/titles checked:

Readability: have someone read your application in the role of peer reviewer or critical friend, to ensure that it makes sense, reads well and that the evidence is relevant to the category of award and the selection criteria.

Readability checked and final edits made

MORE ON EVIDENCE

An application based on an excellent idea or activity can be undermined by weak, incomplete or poorly presented evidence. Strong, relevant evidence will help to:

- demonstrate your strengths, and/or the strengths of the team;
- demonstrate your positive influence on student learning, engagement or experience;
- clarify the scale or significance of that influence, and/or show the time period to which it applies, and
- make specific links between your project or activity, and the Distinctive by Design strategic themes.

Types of evidence

The Panel will expect to see evidence of the following kinds:

- Quantitative evidence: this is numerical evidence derived from a source that is viewed as objective, by virtue of being completely independent of input from the applicant. An example would be ISEQ quantitative data.
- Qualitative evidence: this is descriptive evidence which should provide detail on exactly what you have done, and why it represents exemplary performance or innovative change. To assist your application, qualitative evidence should consist of verifiable information; its value is in explaining why and how an activity is useful and worthwhile, not in merely asserting that it is useful and worthwhile.
- Expert evidence: You may be able to collect evaluative information or opinions from authoritative people within or outside UC who have special expertise in the field relevant to your application. As with other qualitative evidence, the value of their testimony depends both on their expert status, and on how well they explain the merits of your project – for example, by connecting it or comparing it to similar or related other work with known status or value.

- Anecdotal evidence: This is essentially the opinions of people whose knowledge of the field may be relevant, but may also be selective, biased or incomplete. For example, open-ended student comments from ISEQ data might be inflected by experiences that are individual or personal and may not be reliable as indicators of the total value of a course or unit unless supported by other forms of evidence. In person-centred systems (such as education), the opinions of people can be valuable inputs into planning and evaluation, but the uncertain provenance of anecdotal evidence make it the least useful form of support for applications of this kind.

USING YOUR EVIDENCE EFFECTIVELY

| Suggestion | Less effective | More effective |
|---|--|---|
| Be clear, concise and accurate: The most persuasive applications state their evidence objectively and dispassionately. | Since the beginning, the TRPA has been of great interest to external business organisations and has been highly successful in gaining formal recognition. | Since 2012, the TRPA has been formally recognized by more than ten external business and research organisations, including the National Parks Association Award (2013), the Dunning-Kruger Award (2015) and Voight-Kampf Ltd's Young Entrepreneur of the Year (2019). |
| Be relevant: Ensure you make it clear how the evidence is relevant to the criteria you are using it to support. | The Discipline has 5 academics: two at Level A, two at Level B and one Level C. There are two support staff in the School, and the TRPA program is mostly managed within the Discipline. | The TRPA program is directed academically by one Level C and one Level A in the Discipline, with 0.3 admin support from School support staff as needed. Submissions are co-judged with senior staff from the Faculty of Improbable Developments. |
| Combine qualitative and quantitative evidence: Qualitative evidence links facts to lived experience, while quantitative evidence reveals the dimensions of an issue. Combine where possible. | Rural people are often very stressed not just by the events themselves, but by their lack of knowledge about where to go for help. | In a survey of 67 rural families in affected areas conducted by Discipline staff in late 2018, 71% of respondents rated their anxiety about government support as either high or very high, while 67% reported lack of awareness of sources of support. |
